In section 3.5, corrections have been made on p. 102 f., in order to place the experience of the Paris commune in the exact historical framework.

The changes in detail are the following:

1. On p. 102 f. the following text was deleted:

“In Paris, in particular, radical movements of the working class pushed the revolution to the institution of the Paris Commune, an attempt to organize the government of the city under principles of direct democracy, linked to the practice of government under the Jacobins’ time. The Commune was quickly dissolved, but the Republican Constitution of 1848 affirmed universal male suffrage and incorporated people’s requests of social emancipation, starting with the proclamation of the right to work.”

2. In the subsequent paragraph, the sentence

“With regard to the frame of government, the Constitution of 1848 set up a presidential government, deemed, at that moment, as a method to consolidate the republican achievements;”

has been changed to

“With regard to the frame of government, the new Republican Constitution of 1848 set up a presidential government, deemed, at that moment, as a method to consolidate the republican achievements;”

3. In the following paragraph, the sentence

“Following the defeat of Sedan, a new Republic took shape, the Third Republic (1870–1940):”

has been changed to

“Following the defeat of Sedan, in a context of national crisis, in Paris radical movements of the working class promoted the institution of the Paris Commune, an attempt to organize the government of the city under principles of direct democracy, linked to the practice of government under the Jacobins’ time. The Commune was quickly dissolved and a new Republic took shape, the Third Republic (1870–1940):”
